In Parkinson's disease (PD), the basal ganglia and the cerebellum are involved and the extrapyramidal system is the basis of a wide spectrum of motor symptoms. The differential role of the two cell groups in the cerebellum--Purkinje cells and the interneurons of the cerebellar cortex--is not clear. The changes in these cells due to PD have been suggested. To assess balance control in PD, an effector, such as a platform, is moved in the range of the available control, and the signals of equilibrium are measured. As equilibrium is maintained, the intrinsic control strategies are operating. The signals of equilibrium (centripetal and/or centrifugally) are analyzed and compared with healthy subjects. The effect of drug treatment on these signals is assessed. The measurement of these signals by means of the inertial sensors (inclinometers) is simple and reliable. However, some questions are raised due to the intrinsic characteristics of the movement of the subject and the effector during these measurements. Clinical trials are also presented in PD patients. Various interventions are used to alter balance control and to assess its effect. Nevertheless, some data indicate that the effectiveness of such interventions for PD may be marginal.
