The present invention relates to a device for sensing the presence of the feet of a horse in the stirrups of a saddle, in particular for protecting the horse from injury. Numerous devices have been suggested heretofore for sensing the presence of a human foot in the stirrups of a saddle in order to protect the human from injuries, but none of these known devices has proved to be useful for sensing the presence of a horse foot in the stirrups of a saddle. The present invention relates to a toy projector assembly and more particularly to a unique spin toy projector assembly that is operated by a child at play. Toy projector assemblies are well known in the prior art. Typically, such prior art toy projectors will utilize a small projector body to which a film strip is secured by several sprocket holes. However, the prior art projectors do not provide means for a child to operate the toy at his or her own leisure time. The present invention is specifically directed to such a toy projector assembly in which the toy projector is operated at play by a child. Differences in the predictive value of fetal biophysical data between Thai and American populations. This retrospective study was performed to identify possible risk factors associated with preterm birth using biophysical data. Our study included a total of 620,184 pregnancies. The accuracy of the screening tests for predicting preterm birth was compared between pregnant women in Thailand and American women. The accuracy of predicting delivery before 34 weeks' gestation was higher for American women than for Thai women, but the prediction of preterm birth was lower for American women than for Thai women at or after 35 weeks' gestation (83.0% vs. 84.0% for American women and 77.2% vs. 87.7% for Thai women). Although the accuracy of predicting preterm birth was higher for American women, the performance of the tests was lower at or after 35 weeks' gestation for American women compared with Thai women.
