This motion data is used to provide in-game dynamic behaviours in player movements, ball physics and also new player and ball control options in the game. How it works. Visualize capture (from EA Sports) Within the game engine, we make use of a specialized motion capture suit in order to collect the same kind of data that you would see from a player in real-life. At its core, the engine is completely unaware of the player or the character. Everything it sees is data that it renders from memory. When you run through the "I Need a License" tutorial in the demo, you'll see that we've done some basic stuff with it - we've made a comparison between the 360 and PS4 version and we've taken video from the player's perspective. Some interesting things to note, we've stored the data from the 360 version to create a fuller motion capture in the PS4 version. We've added new animation layers, such as a shot player, as well as new animations, like a specific running animation layer. How we use the data. Visualize data (from EA Sports) In-game, we take in this data and blend it with our game code to make it feel more realistic and immersive. The engine itself has a different feel from FIFA 20, and this data helps give us that feel. For example, when you use the new PPSW move, which was inspired by the S-SWIM move in "FIFA 20," we have this new animation layer we've created to make the moves more believable, more lifelike and more dynamic. That's the process: take the in-game data and apply it to the different gameplay experiences. The graph on the right is an example of how we take data and we blend it in the game engine. You can see there is specific data that creates a specific feeling in the game. "We've balanced the energy," explained Alex Palacio, FIFA Lead Producer, "making sure that the simulation runs at a consistent pace." More detail: New player button in the dribble. Visualize data This button is placed on the left stick instead of right. You'll also notice that the ball travels a little further on the run than you can actually

This mode features a team management experience, including creating your club and team, scouting new players, hiring managers, and allowing players to leave your club if they want to. In addition to these modes, a match can also be a warm-up or friendly match, during which there are no goals to score. You can play 8 minute halves, 15 minute halves or 25 minute halves. Training Mode Training mode is a tutorial-style set-up that teaches players how to perform and master a certain game-type. The mode consists of a series of tutorial "exercises" that are divided into one-on-one and small-sided games, and each individual exercise teaches one key skill with real-life scenarios.
