The present invention generally relates to a handpiece that is attachable to a mandrel to facilitate the cutting, grinding, removal or shaping of hardened material in or on a workpiece with a tool (e.g., a cutting tool or a grinding wheel) operable in a reciprocating manner within a cavity of the handpiece. More specifically, the present invention is directed to an articulated, handpiece having a handle that is designed to provide a relatively stable support and to generate relatively high torque or rotational force at the tool. Manually-operated, hand-held, oscillating or reciprocating cutting, grinding or milling tools are well known in the art. Such tools, such as electrically-powered cutting tools or devices, are used in a wide variety of applications, such as for cutting, grinding, shaping and/or milling hardened materials, such as metal, plastics, ceramics and the like. An example of a hand-held, reciprocating cutting tool is illustrated and described in commonly assigned U.S. Pat. No. 5,222,893, which is incorporated by reference herein. This patent discloses an electrically-powered, hand-held cutting tool that is used to shape and finish complex workpieces. The cutting tool is comprised of a knife blade unit that is slidably received in a housing, and an electrically powered motor that is operatively associated with the knife blade unit. The motor is manually activated to cause the blade unit to reciprocate relative to the housing to enable the knife blade unit to cut and finish the workpiece. In particular, the hand-held cutting tool comprises a housing that is configured to receive a spindle or mandrel having a cutting tool that is rotatably mounted on the spindle. The cutting tool can be reciprocated along a longitudinal axis of the spindle by a motor operatively associated with the housing. In such an arrangement, the housing has a handle at a distal end thereof that enables an operator to operatively connect the housing to the motor to allow the housing to be manually moved or manipulated

We All Get Shoots We All Get Shoots is the fifth album by Irish singer-songwriter Gerry Rafferty, released in 1981. It entered the album charts in the UK and Ireland and earned Rafferty a Silver disc, meaning it sold approximately 20,000 copies. Rafferty has indicated that this was the first album he recorded after the tragedy of losing his brother-in-law and business partner, Dallas Crane. This album was the first to feature Richie Hayward, who would become Rafferty's long-term producer and bandmate. The album included the singles
